it has come to our organizations attention, a 501c3 historic preservation agency, that even in the small communities, and rural areas, this is becoming a major issue. we feel that all people's remains should stay in tact and be cared for in the same way their families wanted it when they were buried, out of respect. ownership of same seems to be a major roadblock. maybe some type of public monies should be set aside, but this will only become a larger and larger issue in the future. i don't have an answer, but our organization is helping to bring to public attention the sorry state of cemeteries in our counties. archaeology of same, that is a tricky issue, in that we learn so much from these digs, but on the other hand , would we want anyone to dig up our grandma?
